Mr. Copeland, whom they had also seen before, and Mr. Goodwell, from British North America, who, as he had already said, had laboured in the south among a nation of cannibals, but who had nevertheless exercised a wholesome influence, so much so that Ouchief had stood up in his behalf and refused to listen to the white men who wished to take his life. He had much pleasure in introducing these three missionaries

The Rev. Mr. Poyze had much pleasure in again appearing before them in behalf of the New Hebrides Mission. It was now twelve years since he had been expelled from Tanna, and sent to Sydney to try to obtain a vessel in order that they might extend and carry on the mission work in those islands. An appeal was then made to the churches and to the Sunday schools, by whose aid, and with God's blessing, a vessel (the Dayspring) was obtained and sent down to their islands. The contributions of God's people and the Sunday-schools paid in that vessel, and she was supplied with all things necessary.

The Daypring did her work well, and wherever she was the natives never hesitated to come off to her. He had been on board of her at islands where the people were afraid to come until they found that the vessel was the Daypring. When he had appeared before them the first time he warned them of the mission, it was then at a very low stage of the war. He had, then, three stations where they had bad more, but the others were closed. What had since been the result? He had had twelve stations and twelve missionaries upon different islands, and God had given them such success encouraged them as a mission to persevere, until they extend their operations to the other twenty islands, still in a conditional heathen darkness. When they looked at what the Gospel had accomplished in those islands, and then looked at the condition of the heathens in the other islands, their hearts would bleed within them for the poor heathens who were perishing for want of the knowledge of God. But they believed that the Gospel was mighty in the hands of God to accomplish His work. They had seen the mightily power of this Gospel in some of the islands, and they knew it had only to be extended to the other islands in order to accomplish a similar work. They must have a vessel for their mission. On some of the islands they were entirely dependent upon Sydney for their supplies, and ordinary trading vessels came at no regular intervals, so that the

would not be depended upon to supply the missionaries' wants. It would be remembered that in January last the dear little vessel—the Dayspring—was lost. When the news of that event came to the island where he was, the natives wept and mourned. Day after day for weeks, and even up to the time when he left they would say their hearts were still sorry because the Dayspring was lost. That event was a heavy loss to the mission, but the Providence of God had enabled us

Steele and Mr. Cosh to send them the Paragon, which had proved a good vessel, and adapted for the work in every way. The passengers were therefore agreed to obtain this vessel, if possible, and to employ it for the work. During the summer of 1850 had been recovered from the insurance on the Paragon, but they required £1000 more to purchase it. Then there would be another thousand required to outfit her and provide her with the necessary supplies. The Paragon could be obtained for £3000, and the money could be raised by the sale of the land. The money could be put forth, might they not then appeal on their friends here to assist them to purchase this vessel? His pointed out that his hearers enjoyed many privileges in this Christian land; they were endowed with many gifts, and many comforts.

hearts were in the right direction. The missionaries did not come there simply as beggars, but they made the appeal in the name of their great Lord and Master. They went among these heathen, and they gave up all resources as that of Christian society, and of meeting any God's people on the Sabbath. They went with their lives in their hands, mightily trusting in the power of the Gospel of God, and make them heirs to eternal life; but then ask them to give a little in order that their work might be extended, and the Gospel carried to the who had never yet heard it. He confidently has labored by their liberality and instrumentality they would be enabled to go on with greater success, and to have more give the "Paraguay" had have been free from sin, and that she would be maintained by these colonies. It Steel had referred to the many difficulties the mission had to contend with. He did not intend to dwell upon these, but there was one he could not pass over. A letter appeared on the 20th of the month in the Springfield Mass. Patriot, in which the writer, a Unitarian, declared that the missionaries had civilised the natives. Now, the missionaries christianised in order to civilise. If the writers of this letter had taken the trouble of going about ten miles, to Pango Point, where Mr. Cook had laboured, they would have seen some of the natives, and would have been able to tell us two or three things in the fear of God, with nine elders teaching the people to serve the Lord Jesus Christ. They would have seen all the heathen practices had passed away, and they would have seen the people meeting together to serve God, and recall all their worldly affairs by the word of God. They would have seen a new and a better social system, and a new organization in their midst. You ought to ask an observer the question in that letter. Mr. Cooh had planned to work that had christianised and civilised their tribe. But that was only one island. They had heard about Florida. That place had had many trials, and many had been called martyrs. There the noble Georgians, said and sealed their testimony with their blood. So Mr. Cooh, and some of the Georgians had sailed, walked across the island, assembled the whole of the natives who were favourable to Christianity, and told them that he was determined to protect the missionaries, and those natives who would unite with him he would take as his station and protect. Seventy of the natives united with him, and walked over to the station. They looked over to books Mr. Gordon said, and which were in the hands of the natives, and in glory. These books will speak to us, and through them we can extend the Gospel of God. They lost the books and manuscripts in their own language to station, determined to protect them to the last drop of blood. Were men like that not able to grade the others? And these men, who were so full of life and love, and endeavoring to spread the influence among the heathen. At Antioch, were Messrs. Geddie and Inglis had laboured for many years, the whole island was professedly Christian. There was a large church, 100 feet in length by 40 feet in width. Then there was Anaba, the mission station, where the group of young men, who had been intended to return to Tanna, but was compelled to flee, and go to Aniba. There he found nothing but savages, who had no interest in the Gospel the missionaries had brought to them. They attempted to take the missionaries' lives, and had been frequently within a breath of death from them. They were obliged to leave their country and learn their language, and give the Word of God in their own tongue, and they will succeed. They learned the language, and composed a little book in it; they also translated one of the Gospels, and had it printed. They taught the natives to read and just in proportion as the light of truth was shown to them, they were more ready to receive the heavenly practices. At first the missionaries could scarcely keep a knife or spoon, and although they knew well where they could get no redress. But the result of seven years' teaching was that nothing was stolen from the missionaries now. If any native attempted to do this, The Bible point opened would come down upon the people, and that it was not because of sin, but because of sin. It was in Sydney. He had seen more Sabbath destruction during the last three Sundays in Sydney than he had seen in the last three years in the little island he was visiting. The Sabbath there was strictly a day of rest, and he did not cooking on that day. There were many of the members of the Church there, and he saw many of the Word of God among the people. He heard for: although they had cast away their sins, he did not mean to say they were all true Christians. Nevertheless, they had made some gratifying advancement. He would, then, challenge the writers of that letter to do the missionaries, by christianising the people further to that advanced civilization. He would do this further to that point in the world with the working. He would do the mission in chains that would.

(Applause.)

The Rev. John Goodwin appeared before them as a stranger, and therefore, for himself and for his brethren, all the more valued the cordial welcome which he gave to them that night. The Rev. Dr. Reed had before them many facts connected with their work to the New Hebrides, such as tended to turn them from their present state; and viewing them for some time, perhaps, he disposed to hasten into the mission had not been attended with a greater amount of success. He would tell them why the success he achieved had not been greater than it was at present. His reason—and amongst the first—was the state of the natives.

BRISBANE.

An official telegram from Junction was received yesterday. It states that about six hundred persons are at the Palmer River, and that many more are en route. Rations are not purchasable, and only eight tons of flour are on the road, which is impassable for bullock drays on account of seventy miles of broken stony country. A first-class horse-team took six days to travel seventeen miles in consequence of the bad roads. One storekeeper ordered back eight bullock-teams proceeding with goods. There appears to be a fair amount of gold, but no regular field has been yet discovered. An opinion is entertained that there is a valuable field in the vicinity, but it is considered difficult whether butchers and cattle can afford to follow the present road. Drays with police escort have been on the road five weeks, and are nearly half-way. The blacks attacked a party of ten prospectors, and wounded two, one dangerously. In the blacks' camp ship-belts have been discovered, showing the vicinity of the sea coast.

Nearly 150 tons of tin have been received from Warwick during the week.

A Rockhampton copper mine, near Clermont, took fire on the 17th inst. It is believed that the fire was caused by a lighted candle left by careless miners. The damage is slight, but the smoke is causing great inconvenience.

According to the extent of present exportations from Rockhampton, the quantity of freight sent out by the steamers, yesterday, was large.

Quantities of preserved meats, tallow, and wool are awaiting shipment.

There has been a heavy thunderstorm to-day, with copious rain, which was much needed. The lightning was very vivid, and killed two horses. This is the only injury reported at present.
